Reginning as a Clergyman.

"But I started out to tell you a story about gambling which I hope you will find interesting. It will surprise all of you, gentlemen, to hear that I began life twenty-five years ago as a clergyman. I was young, married and struggled hard for fame and bread, receiving none too much of either. I was located at Memphis as paster of a little Baptist church. The salary was small and my labors met with but little encouragement, when I received a call to a more remunerative field of labor situated a few miles from New Orleans. After consultation with my wife we concluded to accept the offer, consoling ourselves with the reflection that the better we lived the more fit we should be to aid others less fortunate. Disposing of our household effects, we embarked on the stuffy little steamer Roanoke, bound from Memphis to New Orleans. The voyage down the Mississippi was monotonous, as such trips usually are, until, as I was walking back and forth on the saloon deck, my eye was caught by the remarkably fine physical bearing of a man seated at one of the tables. His chief charm lay in the infraction of law; and that naturally his large, lustrous black eyes. The colonel, as I afterward found him to be, was engaged in conversation with two men, evidently planters. I had discarded my regulation black coat and tie and wore a mixed tweed, in which I appeared more worldly than I cared to own. Perhaps it was my appearance or my close scrutiny that elicited an invitation from the colonel to take a hand in a game of poker he had just suggested to the planters."

Here the story teller stopped to order some more mint and sugar before resuming his story. "Gentlemen," he continued, "I never have been able to satisfactorily account for my actions that afternoon. I think that I must have been hypnotized by those wonderful black eyes of the colonel, for I accepted his other weakness to which flesh is heir," he proposal without a qualm of conscience. I continued. "I allude to gambling. Do you had in my pockets a little more than $300. realize, gentlemen, that nearly every busi- which was to furnish our new home. This ness man in your acquaintance is a was the savings of years and my wife's last gambler? No, I don't mean that he bets injunction was to guard our little capital with my life. All this firshed through my mind as we entered the cabin. Partly coming to a realizing sense of my degradation, I tried to offer some weak excuse for not playing. But before I could utter my protest the colonel had literally forced me into a chair and I found my fingers nervously lutching five new, slippery cards. Before entered the university I had lived as other young men do, and, to my horror, I found I remembered with apparent ease the most salient points of the game.

"It is a curious fact, gentlemen," continued the narrator, after wetting his epiglottis, "that there is a singular charm in • 8:10 am doing something which your conscience teaches you is wrong. Did ever watermelon taste so sweet as those stolen at night at the imminent risk of lacerated flesh from the teeth of a watchdog? I did not stop to reason, and it was too late to retreat. At least so I thought. Besides I was a stranger to every man on the boat. I remember vaguely to have resolved to explate my sins by unflagging zeal when I arrived at my new pastorate. "The colonel drew from his pocket & spectacle case, which contained a pair of spectacles of extraordinary size. Noticing my rather rude stare, the colonel politely explained that the glasses were made to order, one lens being larger and more powerful than the other to suit his right eye, the night of which was defective. 'I was shipwrecked several years ago,' said the colonel, 'and, with several others, was affoat in an open boat for several days. had lost my hat, I was subject to the full glare of a tropical sun, thereby nearly losing my sight entirely.' I made a sympa# thetic answer, and we started to play.

"For several hands the coins circulated pretty evenly. The colonel and the planters seemed to play more for the sake of the game than for what might be in it in a pecuniary sense. I played with the sole purpose of retaining what I already possessed rather than to add to it. We had played for more than three hours, and, as it was growing late, Johnson, one of the players, suggested that another round should finish the game, to which we all agreed. I dealt, and was the last to pick up my cards. I could hardly control my feelings as I took up first the ace of spades, next the ace of diamonds, then the ace of hearts, the trey of spades, and last, with bated breath, the ace of clubs. I glanced at the colonel and then at the planters to see if my expression had given any intimation of my luck. All three faces bespoke perfect composure and indifference. I looked at the colonel a second time, feeling that he, at least, must have read my good fortune. This time I could not withdraw my gaze, which was held riveted to his defective eye. He seemed a little uneasy at my manner, and, re-moving his spectacles, wiped them with great precision on a red bandanna handkerchief. After replacing them, he cleared his throat deeply, and again picked up his cards. I did not raise my eyes from my hand afterward until the conclusion of the game. I sat opposite the colonel, Johnson at my left, and his friend, whose name I have forgotten, at my right. Johnson CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND

The betting was • 1:30 am • 1:25 am lively. By raises of fifties we soon had $1,200 in the pot. Here Johnson and his • 5:15 am friend gave it up, and the colonel and I soon had it boosted up to an even $1,500, just the amount of the mortgage on my little home. Gentlemen, I have seen some exciting times in my rather checkered career, but never did my heart race as it did that night. All my ready money was on the table and I had been giving my paper promises for some time. I was betting money I never had and probably never would have, but I was betting on a sure thing. By this time the cabin was full of eager onlookers, and every eye was turned upon me. The situation was getting to be unbearable. I could stand the mental strain no longer. Calling the colonel and simultaneously rising to my feet I exclaimed: " Colonel, I have four aces! You hold four kings!

"The colonel's face, already flushed by
